Herald of Hope

Lesson for September 30, 1962

He was a strange man, John the Baptizer Strange in many ways. His birth was a miracle, and yet in all his life he never performed one single miracle and never tried to. He came into this world by a miracle, and yet when he died with his head chopped off, no miracle was there to save him. He knew more about Jesus than Jesus' own brothers did; and yet he doubted Jesus in a public sort of way as his brothers never showed. Jesus called him the greatest of men up to his time; yet the world, even the Christian world, pays more heed to another ancient figure than to John.

In the Desert

People who dress in camel's-hair clothes and eat locusts and wild honey as a special diet are not common nowadays and they were not in John's day either. A man eccentric as he would not get many to listen to him nowadays; but John had a tremendous audience. The road from Jerusalem to Jericho was —and still is—a steep winding highway, infested with bandits; yet crowds would walk the fifteen miles or so from the city to where they could hear John preach and be baptized by him. No evangelist in America would set up his tent 15 miles from the nearest sizable town; but John did, and the people came. His sermons all could be boiled down to two sentences: Repent! He is coming! Considering everything, especially considering the fact that some people thought he must be Christ himself, John must have been a very remarkable character. He did not fit any pattern, then or now. His long stay in the wilderness, beginning when he was a boy (for no doubt his aged parents did not live till he grew up), made its mark on him. This was good and had its drawbacks too. A desert child, John would not be tied to the conventional, the customary. He had few if any human ties. He could look at the world so to speak, from the sidelines, he had a fully detached view of life. On the other hand, because he lived all alone he did not have the "common touch" that Jesus had. Unlike Jesus, John had nothing to say to the sorrowing and suffering of the world. Where Jesus saw the multitudes as sheep without a shepherd, John spoke of them as a "brood of vipers"—snakes' babies, to put it in plain English.

In Hope

Yet the people, no matter what John might call them, however fierce his denunciation of them as sinners — the people swarmed to hear him. The reader can think of reasons. . . and by the way, any one who is interested in John's story should read all the Bible material, not the few printed verses. One of the reasons, surely, why John was so popular in spite (you might way) of all his efforts not to be, was that he preached just what the people wanted to hear about the future. The people who came to hear him and stayed to be baptized were poor, they were under the crushing heel of a long-staying occupation army.

In Confusion

Jesus indeed came, though as we saw, at first only John knew who he truly was. But he was not the kind of "Messiah" or God's-Man John had expected. We know that a year or two later, when John was near his death in a dungeon, he, the preacher of hope, began to have doubts. He even sent to Jesus to ask if he, John, could be mistaken. We do not know whether what Jesus said to him by his messengers comforted him, but we may believe it did, for Jesus always knew the right thing to say. So we may feel sure that hope returned to him in the end. (Read about it in Luke chap. 7.) John is not the first or the last herald of hope who has been right about the hope, but wrong about how the hope comes true. John had thought the Messiah would be an Avenger, a Destroyer; Jesus came a man of peace. John looked for something spectacular; Jesus showed him miracles, but the kind he looked for. God has his own ways in his world and we cannot dictate how he shall manage it. But we may be sure, as John learned, that "Jesus doeth all things well."
